Slow Progress on Market.

Slow Progress on Market.

Slow progress is being made on the erection of the new municipal market, which is to take the place of the old fish market, at the foot of 11th street southwest. Foundations have been dug and in some of them concrete placed in position, but there the work has stopped, though brick and other material is being delivered. This does not seem to be bothering the wholesale fish dealers, who are now established in temporary quarters out on the District lumber wharf. While at first there was considerable opposition to the temporary fishhouses, now that the dealers are settled in them they are well satisfied and are prepared to do business in them for the next year or longer.

INTERESTED IN PICKETS.

Confederate Veterans Pause to Talk With Suffragists at White House.

Most of them appeared to have followed the women's campaign for votes, especially with regard to the pickets. The pickets report that many of the veterans stop to give a word of cheer and encouragement as they pass, and the gallant men in the faded gray lift their hats as they pass the banner-bearing groups.

One white-haired veteran stepped up to a picket and inquired if he was in front of the White House. She told him he was.

"I knew it," he replied. "I've been three times around this place wondering whether this is where the President lives. Then I saw you girls come out with the flags and banners and stand here. I recognized you pickets and I knew I was at the right house. We-all heard about you pickets down in Alabama and we admire your spunk."
